Learning in the Early Years Conference

Nassau BOCES (Board of Cooperative Educational Services of Nassau County) closely collaborates with various local agencies and school districts to make significant differences in the lives of young children and their families. The strength of this collective approach makes certain the best thinking and resources are applied to each child, family and situation.

The Learning in the Early Years Conference seeks to ensure that all participants gain a better understanding of the issues that surround early childhood education, and the resources and support services available to them through a variety of networks.

The conference continues its tradition of presenting the most current information from the leading research available on early childhood development and learning. This conference presents new information in the most practical and concrete terms so families, schools and communities may benefit directly.

Goals for the Learning in the Early Years Conference

As a result of participating in this year's conference, attendees will return to their workplaces with many new ideas accompanied by definite implementation strategies. This "evidence-based" approach to the research results presented at the conference will bring strategies and practices into focus.

The Learning in the Early Years Conference is designed to reduce the barriers to high-quality care and education for our youngest "students," build meaningful connections between the community and the school, the Head Start program, the pre-kindergarten program, the infant-toddler center or the elementary school, as well as to promote the healthy development of the whole child.

Craig T. Ramey is the director of the Center for Health and Education at Georgetown University and is Georgetown's Distinguished Professor of Health Studies. Dr. Ramey specializes in the study of factors affecting a young child's development in the areas of intelligence, social competence and academic achievement.

During the past 30 years, he and Sharon Ramey have conducted research involving 14,000 children and families in 40 states. He has won many professional and civic awards for his work on the prevention of intellectual disabilities, and for his exemplary early childhood education programs.

Dr. Ramey is currently focusing on education and the public policy factors affecting the successful transition to school, a critical issue in today's educational environment. He is also looking at the creation of a new generation of early childhood education, health and family support programs.

Dr. Ramey is the author of more than 225 publications, including five books, and is a frequent consultant to federal and state governments as well as private agencies, foundations and the news media. Among his books, co-authored with his wife, Dr. Sharon Ramey, are Right From Birth: Building Your Child's Foundation for Life (1999) and Going to School: How to Help Your Child Succeed (1999).

Interestingly, Right From Birth, which received a Gold Award from the National Parenting Association, presents the latest brain research and its practical implications for parents of young children. Going to School offers a summary of research that parents can use to help their children succeed in school and ascend to a well-rounded life.
